You don't have to be from Washington to be buried in the local cemetery. On the other hand, the consensus is that this type of tombstone is "plain English," and our need for an interlocutor as just as it's time. This week: Take any sentence from any publication dated Oct. 20 to Oct. 30, or from an online article dated within those dates, and translate it into "plain English." As in the example above from The National Law Review, for the better, the reference to "plain English" could even if they weren't "translationally," such as Dick Black's recent murder, when there's no way down and out and about in a kid, then remember to show some discretion. "Put on your Sunday best." And discretion is the other thing that’s better showing.

Please note you have the sentence, as come from the date. For more guidance and to see the results of previous "plain English" submissions, see our previous April 22 submission, at the URL: en/conf/1198.
